What's Keeping Financial Services Executives Awake at Night?

New Report Examines Global Trends Affecting the Financial Services Industry

TORONTO, July 9, 2013 /CNW/ - Today's financial services firms face myriad challenges, yet many remain confident in their business prospects, finds research from the recently released Robert Half Financial Services Global Report: Navigating Change in an Evolving Regulatory Landscape. Based on a global survey of 1,100 executives, the report examines firms' most pressing business concerns, confidence levels and reactions to recent regulatory changes.

Key Findings

- Among external forces, financial services institutions globally are most concerned about their national economies, as cited by 46 percent of respondents. Despite these worries, seven in 10 70 percent) firm leaders said they are confident in their country's economic growth prospects.
- Respondents, in general, are even more optimistic about their own institutions: 80 percent expressed confidence about their firm's growth potential. Executives in Canada share a similar level of optimism as their global peers with79 percent reporting confidence in their business prospects.
- Looking within their firms, those surveyed are most worried about business costs (41 percent), profitability (37 percent) and increasing regulatory issues (23 percent), the report found.
- Globally, 88 percent of executives said managing regulatory change has proved challenging.
- Two-thirds (66 percent) of executives worldwide foresee a continuation of heavier workloads due to regulatory changes.
 Thirty-five percent of all respondents, 37 percent in Canada, anticipate spending related to financial regulations to keep rising.
- To address compliance demands, 33 percent of global respondents are working with interim or project professionals and 23 percent plan to add full-time staff. Similar numbers --32 percent and 26 percent, respectively -- were reported in Canada.
- Hiring and retaining employees with the requisite skills will not be easy, however: 89 percent of executives worldwide are experiencing recruiting challenges, and 83 percent are worried about their ability to keep top performers on board.
- Financial services institutions are realizing value from integrated governance, risk and compliance programs. Sixty-eight percent of respondents globally and 66 percent in Canada said these programs have been effective for their businesses.
 Canadian executives cited improved business performance (42 percent), optimized risk-return outcomes (30 percent) and reduced compliance costs (39 percent) as the primary benefits.

"The financial services industry is clearly undergoing great change," said Neil Owen, global practice director of Robert Half Financial Services. "Executives must balance compliance demands in equal measure with profitability goals. The firms best-positioned to succeed are those that are staffed with financial professionals who take a proactive stance to managing regulatory compliance and develop long-term strategies that address shifting business priorities."

Owen added that institutions looking to add staff to support growth and manage compliance initiatives should be prepared for a challenging employment environment. "As firms look to hire, they are encountering talent shortages within in-demand specialties. Businesses face increased competition for strong candidates, and the improved job market has exposed employers to greater risk of losing top performers."
