

Where's The Boss?

Survey: Employee Productivity at Risk After Senior Managers Depart

TORONTO, Feb. 21, 2016 /CNW/ - Employee productivity can take a big hit when the boss leaves, a new survey shows. According to research from staffing firm Robert Half, both workers and CFOs believe having a vacant senior manager role has an adverse impact on the team's efficiency, though those in leadership (78 per cent) are likelier to find it an even greater problem than staffers (69 per cent).

Decreased morale and motivation were the biggest reported causes of lost productivity among both groups, followed by concerns over increased workloads and fear about job security or relationships with the new boss.

"Changes in management create an opportunity for employers to demonstrate a corporate culture of support and open communication with staff," said Greg Scileppi, president of Robert Half, International Staffing Operations. "Whether it's questions about like their own job stability, potential changes to their role or just the process for transition, managers should do what they can do alleviate any concerns employees may have that could impact their ability to effectively do their jobs."

Workers and CFOs were asked, "To what extent, if any, do you believe a senior manager's voluntary or involuntary departure from the organization impedes employee productivity while the role remains open?" Their responses:

	Workers	CFOs
Greatly impedes	18%	18%
Somewhat impedes	51%	60%
Does not impede employee productivity at all	20%	21%
Don't know	11%	1%
	100%	100%

Those who said a senior manager's departure can impede productivity while the role remains unfilled were also asked, "Which one of the following do you believe is the greatest cause of lost productivity?" Their responses:

	Workers	CFOs
Decreased employee morale or motivation	49%	42%
Increased workloads	19%	18%
Fear about job security or the relationship with a new boss	19%	17%
Internal competition for the new position	3%	18%
Something else	8%	4%
Don't know	2%	1%
	100%	100%

Scileppi added, "When a senior member of a team leaves a company, employers should mitigate the risk of decreased morale or increased turnover, by keeping their teams informed, motivated and engaged while moving quickly to replace the open position."

Managers can avoid a drop in productivity and help employees effectively navigate changes in leadership by heeding this advice from Robert Half:

- Cultivate succession and hiring pipelines. Know who in your department or company might be ready to move into a bigger role, and keep a trusted recruiter on speed dial.
- Consider an interim boss. If you don't have someone who can step into a leadership position immediately, hire an interim manager to keep projects moving and workloads in check.
- Move quickly. Minimize the time of uncertainty by filling the roles swiftly yet smartly, making sure you check off all necessary steps.
- Keep everyone informed. Updating your team about the progress of the search for a new manager can help improve staff morale and keep rumors to a minimum.
