More Than Half of Canadian Managers Are Annoyed by Untidy Workspaces

TORONTO, March 23, 2017 /CNW/ - Is it time to spring clean your messy desk? More than half of Canadian senior managers (51 per cent) interviewed by staffing firm OfficeTeam said the most distracting or annoying aspect of employee workspaces is sloppiness or disorganization.

Nineteen per cent of senior managers reported seeing an inappropriate or offensive item in an employee's work area.

Senior managers were asked, "Which one of the following, if any, is the most distracting or annoying when it comes to employee workspaces?" Their responses:

Having a messy or disorganized workspace	51%
Having too many knickknacks or decorations	28%
Displaying inappropriate or offensive photos or phrases	13%
Having a workspace that's too clean or bare	7%
Don't know/no answer	2%
	101%*

Senior managers were also asked, "Have you ever seen an inappropriate or offensive item or decorations in an employee's workspace?" Their responses:

Yes	19%
No	81%
	100%

"Your work area can be viewed as a reflection of you, and a messy desk or distasteful décor may leave people questioning your professionalism," said Koula Vasilopoulos, a district president for OfficeTeam. "Keep any personalization simple and declutter regularly. A tidy space can lead to fewer distractions, and a more comfortable and productive work environment for everyone."

OfficeTeam offers three tips for creating a workspace that leaves a good impression:

- Clean up your act. Spend a few minutes every day clearing out old documents, food wrappers and dirty dishes. Reduce clutter by organizing files or going paperless.
- Keep it simple. It's OK to have a few things in your workspace that are inspiring or fun to look at, but covering your desk with too many knickknacks can be an eyesore.
- Don't be offensive. Remember, items in your work area aren't always for your eyes only. Ditch the political posters, risqué photos and anything that might be too controversial.
