Other Key Findings

- Seven in 10 (71 per cent) lawyers said finding skilled legal professionals is somewhat or very challenging, while 44 per cent of survey respondents expressed concern about losing legal personnel to other job opportunities in the next six months.
- Thirty-seven per cent of lawyers said that, aside from compensation or bonus, challenging work or variety of assignments provides the greatest incentive for legal professionals to remain with an employer. Flexible work arrangements ranked second, receiving 28 per cent of the survey response, followed by professional development opportunities, at 16 per cent.

"To meet rising demand for business-related legal services, law firms are hiring lawyers and paralegals with specialized expertise, such as commercial litigation and insurance defence experience," said Jamy Sullivan, executive director of Robert Half Legal. "General counsel are also expanding in-house teams to reduce their reliance on outside counsel and increase efficiencies. In particular, they are seeking legal specialists with backgrounds in corporate transactions and labor and employment law."

Sullivan added that as competition for experienced legal experts intensifies, lateral hiring is expected to increase in the coming months. "Law firms are recruiting senior-level associates with a book of business as a means to expand high-growth practice areas and grow revenue," she said.

Litigation Expertise in High Demand

More than one-third (35 per cent) of lawyers surveyed expect litigation to yield the most employment opportunities in the next six months, citing commercial litigation as the top driver of job growth within the practice area.
