

57% of Canadian companies offer fewer health and wellness programs than 5 years ago

- Workers cite food at office celebrations as the biggest obstacle to achieving wellness objectives
- 30% of professionals say they eat healthier when they work from home
- 76% of employees bring their lunch to the office

TORONTO, Jan. 10, 2018 /CNW/ - Companies that aren't focusing on employee health and wellness should make it a New Year's resolution. In a recent survey from staffing firm OfficeTeam, more than half of Canadian HR managers (57%) reported their organization has decreased their health and wellness offerings in the past five years.

HR managers were also asked to name the most innovative thing they've heard of a company doing to support employee health and wellness. Here are some of their responses:

- Offering onsite exercise, meditation, yoga and healthy cooking classes
- Providing free massages
- Having trained healthcare providers in the office
- Providing additional days off for mental health
- Offering onsite personal trainers
- Contributing healthy onsite snack and meal options

"As expectations for workplace well-being evolve, companies have an opportunity to significantly impact their employees' overall health and happiness at work," said Koula Vasilopoulos, a district president for OfficeTeam. "Organizations that make wellness a priority, and empower staff with resources that encourage healthy-living at and outside the office, ultimately promote an attractive work environment, and a more productive and loyal workforce."

Additional findings:

- Employees cited food at office celebrations (29%) and snacks brought in by colleagues (26%) as the biggest obstacles to meeting health and wellness goals.
- Nearly a third of professionals (30%) said they eat healthier when they work from home. Of all respondent groups, male employees (37%) and those ages 18 to 34 (32%) reported this most often.
- More than three-quarters of professionals (76%) bring their lunch to the office. Women (82%) were more likely than men to pack their meals.
- While more than a third of employees (36%) are fans of the office candy jar, the same percentage have a love-hate relationship with it. Workers ages 18 to 34 (43%) are especially enthusiastic about this supply of sweets.
